Autoportrait of three artists after talking until dawn

During several nights the artists Mahmoud Khaled, Stephan Köperl and Sylvia Winkler met in different locations for talking about various issues.

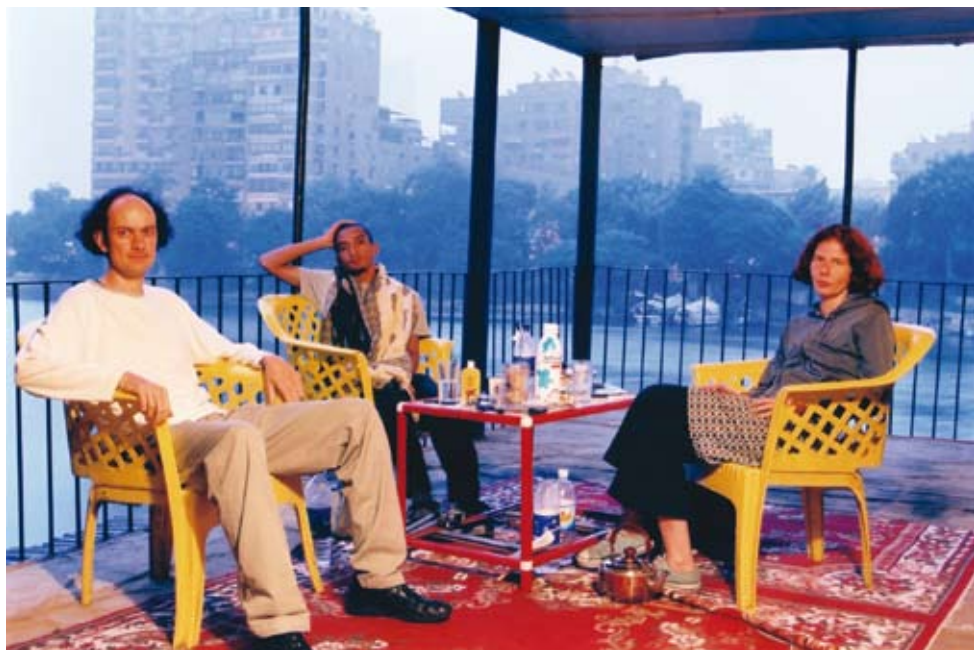

The first light of dawn signified the end of each conversation and the moment for taking a photo of themselves at the beginning of a new day.

The hours between midnight and dawn, this constant period of darkness, did not only seem to be attractive for them because of the minimum of disturbance from outside, but also because of the floating states of attentiveness and concentration along their conversations.

Choosing a different location for each night reflects on the temporary nature of their residency in the city and gives an individual background to the topics of their talk which developed on the spot.
